This is an answer to the first part of your question: If you want to learn the commands of GNU/Linux, read the manual of the Linux documentation and man pages. The manuals are quite self-explaining and very easy to understand. You can also install the GNU/Linux manual in a PDF (e.g. here) and read it on a desktop machine without any additional software. The PDF software is available in the repositories and it can be opened with e.g. Evince. Although the manual can be quite long, it still describes a lot of commands. The amount of commands of GNU/Linux will also grow if you use new software. But here are some good starting points: man man man ls man cp man grep man grep -r man strcmp man strlcpy man cmp man diff man dirname man fdformat man cat man find man printf man sleep man sed man stat man cut man tee man sort man tail man tr man sed -e man grep -e man printf -e man awk -e man readlink man basename man findstr man grep -n man uname Here, you get an overview over the basic commands of GNU/Linux. You can also use this command to figure out if a command is installed: which command The global WEEE and Waste Reduction Market report is an essential source of guidance and direction for companies and individuals looking to venture into the WEEE and Waste Reduction Market.
