The present invention relates to surface cleaning devices, particularly to surface cleaning devices used in the cleaning of dust and dirt from the soil and other surfaces of household and industrial articles, and to a novel dispensing chamber, and a novel trigger for the dispensing chamber of such a surface cleaning device. It is a well known fact that dust and dirt accumulate on various types of surfaces, such as in kitchens and homes. These accumulated dust and dirt become, within a relatively short period of time, a detriment to the functioning of, for example, the furnace, the air-conditioning unit, and other components of the household system. In order to remove these dirt and dust accumulations, various devices have been proposed in the prior art. A common, generally preferred device is a vacuum cleaner. However, while vacuum cleaners are very effective in removing dust and dirt from surfaces, vacuum cleaners are very noisy and do not perform well in other areas of the house. Thus, the vacuum cleaner is not suitable for cleaning the surfaces of furniture, especially deep inside of the furniture. Therefore, a need has arisen for a cleaning device which does not require the use of a vacuum. Various cleaning devices have been developed that attempt to remove dust and dirt from household surfaces without the use of a vacuum. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 4,337,492, issued to Green, discloses an upright cylinder vacuum cleaner which is able to be operated as an electric blower. An upper rotatable brush is employed in the cleaning process. The brushes are employed to dislodge dirt from the surface to be cleaned. The brushes operate in combination with a fan disposed within the cylinder vacuum cleaner. Dust and dirt are sucked into the cleaning apparatus, where it is then collected. U.S. Pat. No. 4,809,475, issued to Gillermo, discloses a portable vacuum cleaner which has suction through an angled hand-held attachment. The angled hand-held attachment is disposed at the rear end of the suction pump, and is provided with a brush head. A vacuum cleaner similar to the Green 2d92ce491b
