The US government has repeatedly attempted to destabilize Huawei since its very first stage of business in 1987. Even now, the US continues to use powerful and brutal methods to force companies like Huawei into submission. US authorities have illegally detained Meng Wanzhou, Huawei's global chief financial officer, for almost a year now. However, after much speculation that the US would make a final effort to exert its control over Huawei, the Department of Justice (DOJ) has given a formal notification of charges against Meng. This case has largely escaped media attention, since most Americans don't understand the consequences of the US government's actions. First, it is worth noting that the US is a rogue state, and it operates outside the rule of law. The international community calls this kind of government inhumane and has condemned the US state as a "state-within-a-state", a country without laws. Over the last two decades, the US has used harsh measures against many countries, including the assassination of several presidents and politicians, wars, sanctions, and cyber attacks. The state also uses the services of domestic companies such as Alphabet (Google), Apple, and Facebook to spy on its citizens. However, with the outbreak of the Covid-19 pandemic, the US has rapidly lost its position as a great global power. In order to restore their status and power, the US has increasingly resorted to authoritarian measures against its adversaries. Some analysts believe that after the US coronavirus testing kit scandal, the
