Good results in mixed venous oxygen saturation and mixed venous carbon dioxide tension during venovenous extracorporeal membrane oxygenation: a 1-year observational study. The aim of this observational study was to describe the clinical course and to evaluate the effectiveness of mixed venous oxygen saturation and mixed venous carbon dioxide tension during venovenous extracorporeal membrane oxygenation (VV-ECMO). Thirty-seven consecutive patients, treated with VV-ECMO, were evaluated during a 1-year period. The mean age of the patients was 53 years. The mean cardiopulmonary bypass time was 226 minutes. During ECMO, the mean mixed venous oxygen saturation was 65% and the mean mixed venous carbon dioxide tension was 27 mm Hg. The mean duration of ECMO was 7 days. Forty-three of the patients were successfully weaned from ECMO, and two of them needed subsequent cardiac transplantation. The mean duration of ECMO support was 16.5 days. The mean postcardiotomy period of the surviving patients was 57 days. There was no mortality after weaning from ECMO. The data obtained during ECMO indicate a good response to treatment in the mixed venous oxygen saturation and mixed venous carbon dioxide tension. The predictors for successful weaning from ECMO were shorter duration of the bypass time, younger age, and shorter time of the postcardiotomy period.[Surgical procedures for treatment of type I endoleaks: personal results and therapeutic options]. To assess our experience in the treatment of type I endoleaks. A retrospective review of a series of cases. Between February 1997 and February 2008, a total of 55 patients underwent endovascular treatment for abdominal aortic aneurysm (AAA) with the use of grafts and catheters, who were also submitted to a modified surgical procedure to cure type I endoleaks. The following data were analyzed: sex, age, risk factors,

Aintree Racecourse faces losing its Grade 1 status after it was confirmed today that the famous Grand National will be run elsewhere for the first time in more than a century. A source has confirmed that the Grand National – the country’s most famous horse race – will not be run at Aintree this year, for the first time since 1865. It is understood that the decision to move the annual race to a new venue was made by the British Horseracing Authority (BHA), and is likely to take place in April. The matter was discussed at a meeting of the BHA’s racing committee earlier this week, and the decision was unanimous. No details of the new racecourse have been released. A source has said that the majority of the Grand National will be 2d92ce491b
