An Ohio teenager whose parents died in a car accident says she's been held at the Dilley, Texas, center since Oct. 22, shortly after arriving with her younger brother and older sister on a smuggling run that became a tragedy after their car crash into a truck. Officials at the center say they had no choice but to detain her, because she was unaccompanied and there were no family members or sponsors to claim her. President Donald Trump recently said that the U.S. is going to start deporting MS-13 gang members. But the mother of a 15-year-old girl claims she's been deported to Honduras and is being held at the border. Advocates for immigrants have long complained that the problem centers around family detention. But in a new report, the Women's Refugee Commission says it's not just families who are being held. "There's a rapidly increasing number of children. It's growing like wildfire," says Sarah Pierce. She is the director of policy and advocacy for the commission. Pierce says unaccompanied children are held in family detention centers, but also in facilities in Louisiana, Pennsylvania and Texas. And it's not just unaccompanied children who are being detained. "We have two brothers. They're both in family detention," says Anastasia Talley. Talley's husband is an American citizen who is a legal permanent resident. He also has a green card. But he was arrested and sent to family detention in Louisiana where the two brothers and the family are being held. "It's been a very scary situation," she says. "I was on the phone, and I wasn't able to get over to the detention center in time to get him out, which was very upsetting to see." Family detention centers are meant to hold adult immigrants who are considered dangerous to the community, but some critics say the facilities are used to incarcerate family members.
