Parapsychology is a major area of scientific study. Parapsychology is the study of paranormal phenomena, including phenomena that go beyond the senses, such as telepathy, clairvoyance, extrasensory perception, mental abilities, and psychokinesis; but also those without such substance, such as the life review, after-death communications, past-life recall, and past-life therapy. The term "parapsychology" may also refer to paranormal phenomena in general, independent of supernatural or religious beliefs. Many consider that parapsychology, along with the scientific study of paranormal phenomena, has been marginalized and its practitioners ridiculed. In the early decades of the 20th century, no major organization considered parapsychology to be a legitimate scientific discipline. The science of the paranormal has evolved since its inception within the study of the paranormal. For example, if ghosts appear and interact with the physical world, that implies they are real. If they do not, then no one believes in ghosts. Parapsychology is an interdisciplinary field of research that investigates the evidence for and phenomenon of paranormal cognition, consciousness, and experience, with the aim of understanding how this is possible in a physical, measurable, and mathematical world. Whether or not this conclusion is reached is more a matter of semantics than one of science. There are many good definitions of the paranormal, and many of these are in use today, but they differ in their emphases. For example, any phenomena that is not explicable by natural laws or forces is considered the paranormal. If you make up a category of phenomena and you use that category, then there is nothing in the category that makes it a definition of the paranormal. Many people think that a therapy such as past-life therapy exists for such purposes as exorcism, to discover a person's "true identity" from past life(s).
