Novel morphological features of primary pulmonary synovial sarcoma. The primary pulmonary synovial sarcoma (PPSS) is an extremely rare subtype of soft tissue sarcoma. We present the clinicopathological and immunohistochemical analyses of six PPSSs. Patient age ranged from 30 to 61 years (mean: 45.8 years). Primary tumors occurred in the lung in five patients and in a mediastinal lymph node in one patient. Tumors consisted mainly of spindle-shaped cells with extensive intranuclear cytoplasmic inclusions, admixed with a small number of atypical epithelioid cells. Tumors displayed focal storiform pattern and abundant hyalinized stroma. Most tumors (n = 5) were strongly and diffusely positive for epithelial membrane antigen (EMA), cytokeratin, S-100 protein, and CD56, but were negative for AE1/AE3, GFAP, desmin, and myoglobin. In contrast, vimentin expression was relatively focal. Diffuse positivity for calponin was observed in tumor spindles. Thus, the diagnosis of PPSS was established. No local recurrence or metastasis occurred during the follow-up period of 13 to 110 months (mean: 56.7 months). The immunohistochemical findings of these PPSSs were different from those of conventional synovial sarcoma and benign reactive mesothelial hyperplasia, and differed from those of alveolar soft part sarcoma. The cytomorphology of PPSS varied, and may include a combination of typical spindle cells, epithelioid cells, and storiform pattern formation. PPSS differs not only from conventional synovial sarcoma, but also from alveolar soft part sarcoma and benign reactive mesothelial hyperplasia.
