Various types of applications require the identification and/or inspection of specific properties of a sample. For example, field-based research of chemical and biological samples requires verification of the identity, purity, and potency of the samples. In addition, chromatographic samples obtained for use in a clinical laboratory require that various properties be verified. Examples of such properties include identity and purity, but may also include a potency determination that establishes the amount of a sample present. For example, a sample of a chemical compound such as biologic agent is analyzed to determine whether the sample is of acceptable purity, as discussed further below. An acceptable sample will be present in sufficient quantity to make its use possible. An unacceptable sample, on the other hand, will not be present in such quantity and will thus be unsuitable for use. In determining the purity of a sample, the identity of the compound in the sample should be determined first. A sample may be tested for its identity by comparison with a standard compound or sample. If the sample is of the same chemical compound as a
