Ink jet printers are generally of two types: continuous and on demand. In continuous printers, a stream of ink continuously squirts out of the orifices to form the ink jet image. A fan or another source of air at right angles to the image surface disperses and carries the ink to a gutter for collection. Because the fan is located at right angles to the image, it does not cool the print head. On demand printers are alternatively a drop on demand print head which sprays ink drops of various sizes to form the image. On demand printers are generally preferred because they are more quiet, they consume less ink, they can be constructed smaller, and they are more reliable. The temperature of the print head of on demand printers is a critical parameter for proper print head functioning and life. Cooling of the print head of on demand
