I've been doing some hands-on work in the past week with a small test instance I've been maintaining as a learning exercise.

Despite the relatively small size of the test instance, more than a dozen people have found it sufficiently useful to remember the password for. This kind of thing may be why, over the years, the password has become progressively weaker. As a result of all the successful password reuse attacks over the past years, people have simply become accustomed to using weak passwords by now. In some cases, people make up a password from a combination of personal details that are somewhat memorable, using one or more of: ...My children. ...My favorite song. ...My spouse. ...My birth date. ...My pet's name. ...The name of a movie. ...The name of a restaurant. ...My name. ...A short message or phrase. ...The first letters of someone's name. ...Numbers. ...The image of someone's face. ...A word I associate with something. ...Words from a book I read, or from a novel I'm writing. ...The initial letters of my own name. After a decade or more of practice, people can often remember a password that they've used previously. A good portion of these are strong, but many are weak; something that starts with "a" followed by "something."

Also, many passwords are hard to remember because they aren't random.

What I've found to work best for me is usually a series of passwords that share a common
