However, the leading warmists were more interested in winning the game of climate politics, and the money was better there, so they were happy to continue to manufacture the case. It's a mistake to pretend otherwise, but let's also remember how much money they had to spend. With billions of dollars of hedge fund money in their pockets, the math doesn't have to be a political problem for them. So long as they can continue to control and dominate media messages, their side remains confident of victory. At the hands of a few determined people, climate science has become a system – a powerful hierarchy of organizations where beliefs are enforced and mistakes are punished. The system worked splendidly when it was new, although the ideas were weak and erroneous, but once you've established a climate consensus, you stop looking in other directions. Now, you have the Royal Society, the IPCC, the UN, the entire climate establishment, and the global media telling you one story and one story only. In the climate industry, speaking up and questioning the orthodoxy makes one an enemy of the movement, so most people just accept it. The word "science" in this context simply means "scientific consensus" and the climate establishment understands that repeating the same word often enough will eventually mean that it has to be true. They are professionals, and they know better than to question the established orthodoxy. In an academic paper, a scientist is supposed to write like a mathematician, he does not argue like a politician. "Increasing temperature is a multi-faceted process, and how we conceptualise and address it requires a review of our understanding of the
