Jan 27, 2020 Changes in endurance training regimen alter both the physiological responses and the sensitivity of the cardiovascular system to catecholamine antagonists. Thirty-eight sedentary males were assigned to a control or training group and were classified as either lean or obese. Training consisted of a steady-state swimming exercise with continued 40-km competitive bicycle rides. While no differences were found for sedentary lean versus sedentary obese men, the heart rate and blood pressure responses of the lean and obese trained subjects differed. The postprandial blood pressure and heart rate responses of the trained subjects were reduced, while the responses of the untrained subjects were increased. The greater sensitivity of the trained subjects to norepinephrine (NE) on resistance vessels, and to dopamine (DA) on alpha-adrenoreceptors, may explain the differences in blood pressure and heart rate responses observed in the untrained subjects. In contrast, the greater sensitivity of the trained subjects to NE on beta-adrenoreceptors is related to a greater contribution of beta-adrenoreceptor activation to vasodilation in the trained group., it consists of fragments gathered in the British Museum from the Old Testament repository in two separate monuments. The so-called Slaughter-Stone, discovered in 1853 in the 'Middle Thorngrove' of Sussex, presents a close parallel to other Old Testament stones, especially the Israelite Stone or the Stone of Rimmon (now in the British Museum). This stone, discovered in 1826 in the Ticino near Rovereto, Italy, is also inscribed with a law code. The slab was part of an altar on which seven oxen were sacrificed. (In the British Museum, a similar altar is in the restoration room.) It must be stressed that, while the huge number of these stones may be interpreted as the remnants of a unique and systematic Old Testament script and as the result of
