For example, many datasets are data sets, which usually doesn't need too much sample to be used. But the data mining task involves a lot of computations. So which package should I use for this? A: There is no standard data mining package as there is no such thing as a "standard" data mining problem. H2O is very easy to install, and use, but H2O does not perform well with very large data sets. In a recent paper published in the Journal of Machine Learning Research, Todd Moulton and one of the R authors (the same guy that developed R) described an algorithm to use the data to solve a large scale multiclass classification problem, and ran a test of the H2O algorithm to that solution. The answer is basically that H2O will work with moderately large data sets, and will be highly unstable as a result. If you plan on having data sets that large, a different algorithm may be more appropriate. In that paper they used Random Forests for the classification problems. To make this more clear, H2O is a very good algorithm for data where it's true that the data is highly correlated. It's also a good algorithm for data where there is a lot of "explaining away" of missing values, as well as data that doesn't show much variance. If the data you have is along those lines, H2O will work very well. I can't speak directly to what you've worked on, but H2O is good for most data sets that are within the norms of what H2O uses.
