Recall-dependent hippocampal functional recruitment in a spatial working memory paradigm: an fMRI study. A continuous performance test (CPT) is a useful tool for investigation of cognitive function in the patients suffering from various diseases, including epilepsy. However, the CPT is time consuming and low sensitive in capturing functional changes during cognitive task performance in patients. In addition, as the scalp EEG is very sensitive to epileptiform discharges, brain imaging experiments including CPTs cannot capture the true brain activities in epileptic patients. We have developed a paradigm of visual working memory task using a spatial CPT and evaluated it in healthy subjects and epileptic patients. In healthy subjects the N-back task has enhanced hippocampal activations as a working memory task, and epileptic patients showed a similar task-dependent increase in hippocampal activity, although the activation of other brain regions, such as parietal cortices, were drastically decreased. In contrast, the performance of epileptic patients was strikingly poor due to loss of recall memory. These results provide evidence that the CPT paradigm is useful for investigating the roles of brain areas other than the hippocampus during cognitive task performance.It is a great joy to announce the launch of our November Festival, and celebrate our partnership with the National Portrait Gallery this year, as we always do. We are so proud to be an original part of the National Portrait Gallery's Fall Festival, which launched this year on 8th November. It's been an amazing year for the Festival, starting with a landmark and hugely successful opening event, The Queen's Warm Welcome to Edinburgh as part of the Queen's Baton Relay. We then had our big national event in March to celebrate 100 years of the National Portrait Gallery, with an evening of performances, films and exhibitions celebrating over 100 years of Portrait Gallery portraits. e24f408de9
