Zoe Saldana, left, and Sandra Bullock in "Practical Magic." (Zoe Saldana, left, and Sandra Bullock in "Practical Magic.") Paul Hiff Suzanne O'Neill's "Practical Magic" is a rickety 1950s road picture with stars Sylvester Stallone and Sandra Bullock, and an oddball sensibility that too often makes the film seem off-kilter. At first, it seems like it's going to be a doubleheader with a gloss on "48 Hrs." "Magic" uses the noirish plotting and New Hollywood stylings to show the poor-but-honest cops (Sylvester Stallone, and his rising-star castmate James Caan), just trying to do their job. The problem is that some sleazy detective type (Sandra Bullock) has snagged Stallone's bulldog-head features and has made him a pawn in her twisted game. When the two of them finally connect, they discover that Bullock's character is actually a witch from the country, and has been keeping up a steady stream of wealth and notoriety by working black magic on the city folks. Of course, Bullock's character is a pawn in her own game as well, about to be put to the test. That, anyway, is one of the weak spots in "Practical Magic," which lands more often than not in a film noir and occasionally a sci-fi version of itself. Stallone is a sort of modern version of the crooked cop (Don Stroud in Fritz Lang's "M," John Garfield in John Huston's "Murder, My Sweet") who finds himself playing key parts in a series of old movies with little regard 82138339de
