Field of the Invention This invention relates to a staining kit and to a method of staining a sample or specimen. 2. Description of the Related Art A wide variety of staining methods are used to enhance or aid visual inspection of specimens, samples, or preparations. The most common staining method is routine hematoxylin and eosin staining of a sample or specimen taken from a patient, which is generally performed by hand. Sometimes, a microscope is used with added staining methods. Another staining technique is a semi-automated or automated staining technique in which a microscope and reagent bottles are combined with a robot, which is programmed to execute a defined procedure for incubating and staining a specimen. One of the problems of staining by hand is that the staining method and procedures are not standardized, resulting in inconsistent staining quality. Furthermore, the time and effort required to perform staining by hand makes such staining methods generally too expensive for routine use. Another problem with staining by hand is that such staining methods are not easily automated, which creates problems for high throughput staining. For example, staining by hand is subject to human error, while automated staining methods introduce the possibility of machine error. Furthermore, different laboratories may use different staining procedures, which may require routine 80eaf3aba8
