You can enjoy this application in Full Version for Free, Comparison of antigen-specific IgE serum levels in a nonsensitized diabetic population and an allergic population. Antigen-specific IgE levels were evaluated in 40 diabetic and 41 allergic children, in order to evaluate the utility of the determination of IgE as a marker of sensitization in children. Antigen-specific IgE serum levels in all subjects were measured by a radioallergosorbent test in response to allergen extract (AERI Test, Seralab, UK) after in vitro incubation with antigen. The results were expressed as arbitrary units (A.U.). In the allergic group we observed a significant correlation between skin reactivity to the allergen extract and antigen-specific IgE levels. The mean values of antigen-specific IgE were significantly higher in the allergic group than in the diabetic group. This indicates that in a population not exposed to exposure to allergens, the determination of IgE levels in the serum may provide data which can help to discriminate between individuals with or without sensitization. The impact of LDL-cholesterol lowering on cardiovascular risk: benefits and side effects of cholesterol-lowering agents. Lowdensity lipoprotein (LDL) cholesterol is the most important risk factor of atherosclerosis. Three statins have been approved in the USA and in the EU for the treatment of hypercholesterolemia: prayastatin, lovastatin, and simvastatin. These drugs reduce LDL cholesterol by 20-80% and they are the most effective agents currently available for cardiovascular risk reduction in patients with and without atherosclerotic disease. Several trials have recently demonstrated that statins can substantially reduce the risk of major coronary events. The effect of statins on the incidence of non-fatal myocardial infarction, stroke, and cardiovascular death appears to be less beneficial. Several factors may account for
