fact that some videos or audio files cannot be previewed right after conversion. iTunes has a vast catalog of media files (music, podcasts, iBooks, etc.) that you can manage with ease. These files can be managed in four different ways: managed by your library, as a series, by the order in which they appear, or by drag-and-drop. To learn more about these methods of file management, visit iTunes User Guide: Managing Media Files \(PDF\). In this article, we will discuss the benefits of managing media files in your iTunes Library, which is the most useful.

1. Keep control of your files When managing media files with iTunes, you have the opportunity to decide which ones get into your library, which ones get removed, and which ones you choose to keep. You can also use your own criteria to sort the files in different ways. For instance, if a song is not compatible with your iTunes Library, you can easily remove it from your device, which will give you more space for media files. And, if you suddenly like a specific song from a band that you had previously ignored, you can add the song to the iTunes Library. For example, if you go to the Music app on your iPhone and try to connect to a song that is not compatible with your iTunes Library, you will be asked whether you want to add the song to your iTunes Library. If the song is added, the next time you open iTunes on your computer, it will already be in the iTunes Library. Another great thing about managing media files in the Library is that you are always the owner of your own files. iTunes Library files cannot be shared with others, but files from the Library of the iTunes Store are shared between users. To learn more about these two ways of managing the files in the iTunes Library, visit iTunes User Guide: Managing Music Files \(PDF\).
2. Easily discover new music As we mentioned earlier, if you accidentally delete a song from the iTunes Library, you can easily add it back. This is also true for the iTunes Store, where you can easily search for new music. For example, you can go to the Search tab on the main interface of iTunes to search for new songs.
