Q: Question on NFS and central/local log files I'm setting up a Linux NFS server for our development network. We want to have just one server to run our /etc/ on, along with scripts for managing our keys and users, who all live in /home/$USER. Now, my question is this: is it good practice to have your local log files reside on the NFS share (/home/$USER/logs/$USER.log), or would it be better to have them live on the file server directly? Is there any way to configure logrotate (or something similar) to pick up changes from these log files live? Also, how does the NFS server handle logrotate? Does it just re-sync the log files to the server each time it's restarted? Or is there a central log rotation script on the server itself? Thanks for any advice!

A: You should try your best to minimize both local and NFS server disk access for both /etc/ and /home/* folders. Ideally /home/$USER/logs/$USER.log file would live on NFS share, since it's the easiest way to ensure that it is always available. If your local disk access to logs is OK, you could configure logrotate on the central file server to 3da54e8ca3
