One known cleaning device has a metallic strip extending perpendicular to the opening of a door and urged in the closing direction by compression springs. The ends of the metallic strip lie against a door stop. In order to facilitate cleaning by causing the metallic strip to expand, i.e. to press the metallic strip against the door, in both the initial and closing direction, a plastic insert extending along a longitudinal edge of the metallic strip is pushed out into a space defined by the metallic strip. This plastic insert is a part of the structure of the wiping and cleaning element. It is a disadvantage that the cleaning and wiping element is necessarily of complicated construction.
