Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a method for manufacturing an optical recording medium. 2. Description of the Related Art Optical disks are known as media for storing a large amount of data for long periods of time. Optical disks such as CD-Rs and CD-RWs (also known as CD-R and CD-RW, respectively) are commonly used as storage media for storing data for use in computer systems, car navigation systems, etc. On the other hand, various types of rewritable optical disks such as magneto-optical disks and phase-change optical disks have been proposed. The phase-change optical disk is a recording medium which is capable of writing and erasing data through a phase change, and which includes a light transparent substrate. The phase-change optical disk is irradiated with a laser beam that has a power for forming amorphous marks by heating the area where the data is written and crystallizing the area where the data is not written. When the area irradiated with the laser beam is a crystalline area, a laser beam power that is sufficient to crystallize the area is recorded. When the area is an am 54b84cb42d
