A: What I think is happening is that each line of output for one of your files is wrapped by a newline character (' '), so you have two sets of newlines on the same line (one from the first grep, the second from the second), and they're both confusing the command. So, you need to remove those newlines. In some cases, you can do this by using -z to remove all newlines before the command, but you can also just pipe the output through uniq: grep -Eio '^[^-]+--[0-9]+-[^-]$' filename | uniq This should give you a list of only unique lines (i.e. no repeats). The -E switch tells grep to treat - as a flag for "one or more of these characters", rather than an ordinary character, so we don't need to escape it (or - as a literal minus sign, etc). The -i switch tells grep to ignore case, so that [^-] becomes [^-] rather than matching things like - or. Note that I've also added the ^ to the start of the expression, because it would otherwise match a line with a single -, which is not what we want. Finally, the -o switch tells uniq to output the unique lines, so that the result can be piped into another command like cat. If you only want to get the first 10 unique lines, you could change the uniq command to this: grep -Eio '^[^-]+--[0-9]+-[^-]$' filename | tail -n10 I think this would be more understandable to most people. A: You could use the -v switch with cut to get only the first 10 lines grep -Eio '^[^-]+--[0-9]+-[^-]*$' filename | cut -f1 -d'|' tail -n10 -v means "Invert
