The original invitation to submit proposals came from Mitchell Schwarzer, who had also set the theme for the 2008 Digital Humanities Conference in Berlin. For the purpose of the 2010 conference in Amsterdam, we aim to not only consider the contexts in which the Digital Humanities takes place but also to consider its potential contributions to the global research community. By highlighting the Global Digital Humanities in a Global Context, we will be able to think a little more broadly about the digital humanities as a community and about how we can address the ethical questions that it raises. In many ways, the Digital Humanities is as powerful a tool of globalist discourse as the Internet is (indeed, the latter is not only, or even primarily, a digital phenomenon). The term “digital humanities,” with its emphasis on computing, databases, textual analysis, and visualization, is just as much a term for a set of communities as it is a description of a discipline. Just as there are many different digital humanities disciplines, there are many different communities of digital humans. We also recognize that there is a difference between reflecting the diversity of digital humans and promoting their diversity. The Digital Humanities Community is diverse. It includes scholars of all backgrounds, topics, methods, and interests. But much of our work has been conducted within a particular disciplinary frame that privileges our particular subject, method, and habits. An individual of Asian background, for instance, will come at digital studies — and at the Digital Humanities — from a different standpoint than a Westerner, and may take on a different set of questions or approaches to her research. Thus, in reflecting on the global digital humanities, we ask ourselves: How do we account for the range of possibilities open to us as global digital humans? Is there space for us — and is there space for us in the world in which we work? It’s important to note that this conference is about building community, not about generating new communities. Instead of asking “How are we going to be more inclusive?” we try to ask “How are we going to be part of a global
