The Roll Back Malaria Partnership (RBM), as part of the Global Malaria Action Plan, aims to reduce malaria transmission by 2000 by, amongst other measures, increasing access to malaria prevention, diagnosis and treatment through integrated approaches, targeting the most vulnerable areas and populations. One of the pillars of the Roll Back Malaria initiative is the integrated Vector Management (IVM) component. A problem with the IVM component is that there is very little integration of the malaria control component with the IVM component. A very large proportion of the targets of the IVM component are 'anti-vector' in nature: changing behaviour and practices to reduce the numbers of mosquitoes feeding on human beings and thereby reducing transmission. These are not sensitive to the negative health effects of insecticides, and for this reason there is less concern about negative human health effects of using the insecticides in the target areas. We argue that the products that will be required under IVM strategies, such as bed nets, are not likely to be part of the drug development process. Instead these products will be manufactured for the treatment of disease in the community where they are used for prevention and, therefore, new regulatory mechanisms for health benefit based on the current risk assessment process are needed. Therefore, a need exists to re-examine the drug development process and how it is currently being used to identify incentives and incentives for new drug development. The pharmaceutical industry has a vested interest in the development of new drugs and has the capabilities to undertake this important task. It is necessary for the industry to make the necessary investment to develop new drugs for the IVM component. The investment will likely translate into financial reward. The partnership framework for malaria control and the IVM component is also a good framework in which to develop a sustainable drug development model for the malaria control programme.
