Thrombolytic therapy is an important therapeutic option for the treatment of acute myocardial infarction and other thromboembolic disorders. Administration of thrombolytic agents in an emergency setting requires rapid initiation of fibrinolytic therapy. Thrombolytic agents are generally administered systemically, however, the effect of the agents on the vascular endothelium may limit their systemic applicability. The present study examined the effect of endothelial cells (EC) on the expression and activity of tissue-type plasminogen activator (t-PA), a key fibrinolytic enzyme. EC derived from human umbilical vein (ECV) and porcine aortic endothelial cells (PAEC) exhibited a dose-dependent inhibition in 570a42141b
