Studies on the relationship between perceived involvement in decision-making and health outcomes have demonstrated a consistent positive link between the two. The aim of this study was to examine this link by identifying the direction and size of the relationship for a group of people who have a high level of involvement in decision-making in one or more domains. Data were collected from 873 respondents (64% female; mean age 45 years) from the 2008 Australian Health Survey (AHS) who responded to questions about involvement in decision-making. The linear regression equation was used to investigate the relationship between perceived involvement in decision-making and health outcomes. The positive link between involvement and health outcomes was found for all models. The effect of perceived involvement in decision-making on health outcomes was not significant for women. The data suggest

What's New in the?

The Vampirex Antispam Plugin for The Bat! provides an easy way to filter spam messages you receive daily.
