IronSync Server provides a real-time synchronization interface. Features include: * Support for a distributed network configuration, * Web-based management interface, * Default installations for Windows, * Default installation for Linux, * Support for multi-CPU servers, * Integrated support for multithreading, * Integrated USB device detection, * Dynamic configuration, * Easy configuration, * Administration, * Network configuration, * Torrent support, * Web interface, * Statistics, * Automatic offline saving. The downside of IronSync Server is that it requires an external database, which should be created by you. You can use MySQL, PostgreSQL, Oracle, MS SQL Server, MS SQL Server 2000/2005, ODBC, Microsoft ADO etc. as the database. The latter ones are supported out of the box. Using IronSync Server IronSync Server is a very easy-to-use application with a very polished interface. Its usage is very easy because the communication with the server is done through a web based interface, which is suitable for usage on a network computer. When installing IronSync Server, you can choose between three options: * Configuration * Local installation * Distribution Configuration: Before you can go further with the management of IronSync Server, you need to take a look at the configuration overview. There are five tabs: * General * Network * Files * Files synchronization * Database General: Here you can see which TCP port IronSync Server is listening to. You can check whether additional services are listening on the same port or not. Additionally, you have the opportunity to provide some general information about the configuration. Network: Here you can see the configuration of your network. If you use a router with routing features, you can see which network ports IronSync Server is listening to. Additionally, you can see the IP address and the DNS server used by IronSync Server. If you use a DHCP server, you can also see if IronSync Server will get an IP address automatically or if the IP address has to be given explicitly. Files: Here you can see the synchronization status of the files. You can see the name of each file and whether it has been changed or not. Additionally, you can see the name of the synchronization client, which sent the synchronization request
