Abdominal and gynecologic complications of pregnancy in 1362 IVF pregnancies--clinical presentation and management. To describe the incidence, treatment, and outcomes of abdominal and gynecologic complications of pregnancy among women who underwent IVF treatment. In a single institution retrospective chart review of all patients who underwent assisted reproductive treatment for the purpose of achieving conception were included. Data abstracted from medical records included demographics, infertility etiology, diagnostic work-up, pregnancy course, and management of complications. Pregnancy was conceived by ovarian stimulation (OS) in 37.2% and natural conception (NC) in 36.5%. A patient's etiology of infertility was significantly associated with pregnancy outcome. The overall rate of abdominal and/or gynecologic complications occurring before pregnancy, during pregnancy, or after pregnancy was 30.0% (n = 205), among which the rate of major abdominal and/or gynecologic complications occurring in pregnancy (n = 31, 15.1%) was highest. The majority (n = 33, 16.0%) of patients had severe and/or life-threatening complications necessitating surgical intervention, assisted vaginal delivery, or ICU admission. The rate of ovarian hyperstimulation syndrome among women who undergo IVF treatment is high (15.1%) and frequently requires surgical intervention. NC is safe, and it may have advantages for women with risk factors for ovarian hyperstimulation syndrome. A semi-quantitative nuclear matrix protein system for the detection of cancer in a mouse model for mammary tumours. We describe a panel of three nuclear matrix proteins, a monoclonal antibody (BC-14) recognizing a 30-kDa protein (pp30) and two mouse-monoclonal antibodies (B23 and B27) that recognize nuclear lamins A and B1, respectively. We have used these three markers to detect the presence of invasive carcinoma within three transplanted mouse mammary tumour models which develop well defined tumours in vivo. Murine mammary carcinomas were induced by the DMBA carcinogen, or by the SV40 large T antigen, or by a genetically engineered mammary carcinoma cell line (Kr-4) that expresses Ha-Ras. These panels of markers revealed that expression of pp30 in BC-14-positive tumours correlated well with the development of invasive carcinoma in DMBA and SV40 tumours and in vivo Ha-Ras tumours. BC-14-positive tumours also had nuclear lamins

Treasury Secretary Mnuchin said on Tuesday that the administration does not yet have a preferred repayment plan for the US-Chinese trade war, contradicting earlier comments by President Donald Trump. Donald Trump has threatened to inflict hundreds of billions of dollars of tariffs on China in order to pressure Beijing into reviving talks to negotiate trade deals, and maintain US-China trade relations on a more even footing. The US president has frequently used the analogy of a family feud between the two nations, citing China's theft of US intellectual property as one reason for the disagreement. However, economic data, including from the US, suggests that the effects of the China tariffs are already being felt, and that the economic landscape will be changing in the very near future. Therefore, the Trump administration will need to find a way to keep the trade-war going - a process that the Treasury Secretary Mnuchin implied could drag on for weeks. Uncertainty about what, if any, legal process would be used to compel the Chinese to re-enter talks - should the US decide to leave the current negotiating table - has complicated the Trump administration's latest strategy for dealing with China. In the meantime, Wall Street has seen its equity markets surge in response to the apparent US-China trade-war resolution. "There is no way to predict whether this would be resolved on Saturday, Sunday, Monday, Wednesday or Friday," Mnuchin told reporters at the Defending Dodd-Frank summit on Tuesday. "There could be multiple outcomes. One outcome could be that we come to a conclusion quickly. Another outcome is we have to continue negotiating and see how long it takes to get there." Mnuchin said that the Treasury Department is "monitoring" the situation, while underscoring that he will continue to be guided by Trump's tariff orders. The Treasury secretary said that the US expects to be able to resolve the China tariffs issue with Beijing, despite the contentious history of economic, social and political relations between the two nations. "With regards to China, we're fine. Our relationships are very good. We expect to have a very good outcome with China," Mnuchin said. "But with China, the question of what happens after the tariffs are implemented is a separate issue. We would monitor as the tariffs are implemented. The important thing is that we're following the president's trade policy. He's been clear that this is an unfair trade policy," he said. In addition to the uncertainty
