Role of bladder heterogeneity in the etiology and management of lower urinary tract symptoms. Bladder heterogeneity, encompassing both inter and intrabladder urethral variations, is believed to play a role in the multifactorial etiology of storage and voiding symptoms associated with lower urinary tract conditions. These conditions include overactive bladder, urge incontinence and detrusor overactivity, which are considered as a spectrum of a heterogeneous condition with overlapping clinical presentations and underlying pathophysiology. Although the role of anatomic variations in the development of overactive bladder and urge incontinence is less certain, they have been reported as common causes of these symptoms. Intrabladder urethral variations such as urethral diverticula and uterovesical fistulas can be associated with storage and voiding symptoms and should be considered in the diagnostic work-up of these patients. Although the results from studies on the application of ablative therapies to symptomatic inter and intrabladder urethral diverticula have been encouraging, their long-term efficacy is as yet unclear.
