The local number 23 received a lot of complaints: Indeed, not only in T-Mobile France, but also in many other T-Mobile countries the number 23 has a negative connotation. People don't like this number, since it is the number of the Devil! The fact that it is T-Mobile's local "emergency number", does not help much either. People are also very annoyed that T-Mobile doesn't do its utmost to stop or warn of this "number 23". It is most likely that you are the only one who hasn't heard of the 23, but here are some interesting info about this number to convince you to stop being superstitious : In the USA, according to the FCC (Federal Communications Commission), the 23 is the last digit of a permanent number. When one dials 911, the operator asks you to state your telephone number and once you say the first digit of your telephone number (the last of your telephone number). Depending on the place in the country where you are calling, you will get the option to get the District (Number) Center which is responsible for providing you the police or fire department or ask for the police number. When you call the 23 from the US, there is no option to indicate what department you're calling. As a result, in the US, the call is answered by a call back-center, who plays the call back number for you in order to call you back, and from that moment on the operator is only interested in handling the call back request. In the UK, after you dial 23, you are taken to a list of 111 emergency numbers. If you dial any number on the list, you will be directly transferred to the police or the fire brigade. Although these numbers can come handy in some situations, their absence does not indicate that there are no police or fire crews in your city/town, or that the citizens of your city/town don't have a police or fire service. It only means that they have not identified and have not been able to get the contact information for the national emergency number.

Raman optical trapping of a nanodroplet with a flat needle by using a fiber end mirror: numerical simulations. We theoretically predict that the optical force originating from a flat optical end mirror can trap a droplet in air during a Raman scattering process. The oscillatory motion of the droplet is analyzed using a ray-optics method, and the influence of the droplet volume and the optical end mirror position on the trapping force is investigated. It is shown that a nanodroplet with a radius of a few tens of nanometers can be trapped. The numerical results are in good agreement with the predictions from the ray-optics method, and they provide guidance for the experiments to trap a droplet in a fiber or a prism. to make a legally sufficient showing on the essential elements of the case for which he has the burden of proof, and which he fails to do, the trial court should sustain the motion." Id. at 9. The unique burden of proving the suppression of evidence by a preponderance of the evidence requires a defendant to show that the evidence "has been discovered by exploitation of a primary illegality," but not necessarily by exploitation of a prior illegal search. The defendants contend that the relevant evidence in this case has been discovered by illegally-obtained evidence and should be suppressed pursuant to the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. We disagree. "A trial court's ruling on a motion to suppress is reviewable on appeal, and findings of fact will be upheld unless the evidence preponderates otherwise." State v.
