Q: Should I make my new WinForm UI application run as LocalSystem? I'm on Windows 7 and have my main desktop in Desktop mode. I've got several programs working on this computer and have all of them run as Administrator. I'm debating whether or not to use LocalSystem when creating a new WinForm app. I'm mostly concerned about if there will be any issues if I run the application as LocalSystem and a user tries to access files with my app. Has anybody seen or run into any problems? A: If you run your application as a standard user you will not be able to access the system files (such as documents and the registry). It sounds like this is not a problem for your app and you are just concerned about what the user does on their own files. That's a perfect example for why you should not run it as LocalSystem, you should run it as a standard user. A: In addition to running as Administrator, you should be using the proper security rights. For instance, files and folders created within a program's installer should be owned by the installer and not the user that runs the installer. It is recommended that you create new folders within a program's installer as an administrator and they will get proper security rights.
