Animal anatomy is the study of the anatomy of non-human species. The word animal is used to refer to any living thing, including animals, plants, and protists. Humans alone make up the animal kingdom, and they are classified as vertebrates with a spinal cord. While there is no such thing as a human-specific anatomical structure, the human body shares many features with that of other members of the animal kingdom, such as the digestive tract, teeth, and the reproductive system. Animal anatomy in general includes all structures common to living animals; each animal species uses a similar set of organs and tissues, and with only minor variations between species, with some parts being more obvious and others less. As a branch of biology, animal anatomy is usually subdivided into animal physiology, Zoology, and Morphology. Animal anatomy is usually classified into two types: comparative anatomy and descriptive anatomy. The former compares the anatomy of one animal species to another, where the former are creatures that belong to the same taxonomic class, and are more closely related to the latter. The latter deals with the specific structures of an individual animal, and includes the gross anatomy
