allspintopgameskeygengeneratorAtheists and other Americans who insist they're acting in good faith when they speak out against religion never come out with the same rationale they give to the rest of the world. When these people speak out against organized religion as a whole, they often use the arguments of some of the most rabid, anti-religious fundamentalists around. Think about it this way. You're sitting around a table, with your friends. You don't like the way that one of your friends is talking. What do you do? You don't argue with that person. If you do, you're not acting in good faith. You're out to prove that your friend's arguments are wrong. In other words, you're trying to win the argument. This is how atheists and other freethinkers try to do with their "Good-faith Atheists" articles. They point out one of the most irrational beliefs in the whole of religion, and then they point out the main things that the rest of the world sees when they hear that belief. They're not trying to prove to the believers that it's false. They're trying to win the argument. Most of the time, a good-faith atheist tries to present his or her arguments as the other side of the coin. I can't say that there aren't any atheist activists or journalists who really are acting in good faith when they go out of their way to point out one of the most vicious and irrational beliefs in all of religion. The only problem is that the atheists who do this are then forced to engage with people who really believe that God will punish them after they die, and that this punishment can cause them to be struck dead by lightning, imprisoned in purgatory, swallowed up by dragons, or have their bodily organs removed. They also believe that because of this, they are currently punished by an incredibly cruel God for failing to kneel before a picture of a man they believe to be Jesus Christ. This is a religion that doesn't make much sense and that does make some people 3e33713323
