The emergence of health in Old Age: future trends in China. This paper reviews China's health and welfare status in the context of the demographic transition and the early stages of the ageing process. Studies indicate that during the 1980s China's health indicators were generally in line with those in many other developing countries. However, given the large size and growth of the elderly population, rising health and welfare problems have already started to emerge. Data from the 1987 National Probability Survey of the Aged show that income from private insurance was the only source of health and welfare benefits for 18.4% of the population in the age group 50-59, rising to 27.3% among those aged 60-69.
