A recent study in the journal Environmental Health Perspectives says the air quality in these areas is worse than Beijing's and even above that of the Chinese capital's worst polluted days. The report said children and the elderly were most at risk. The director of the toxicology centre at Queen Mary University, London, says "we're looking at an area of Asia with unprecedented air pollution". Working in New Territories Image copyright Getty Images St John Ambulance has said a "mass casualty incident" could be triggered in the coming weeks, as the combination of its high concentration of air pollution with high humidity could lead to a spike in respiratory conditions. The report looked at public health data from a 2012 air quality survey, and compared it to data from 2015, which was the worst year in Beijing's history. As part of that study, they also looked at 19 other Chinese cities. Beijing ranks as the worst in the world due to the size of its population, which, coupled with dense housing, means it's also the most polluted. But the northeastern city of Xi'an is the most polluted capital city in the world, followed by Delhi, Mexico City and the Persian Gulf
