Mehta, Department of Mechanical Engineering, Indian Institute of Technology Roorkee, Uttarakhand, India.Q: Why did my child develop OCD and dissociative identity disorder? My daughter was diagnosed with OCD and dissociative identity disorder. She now has countless rules, compulsions, and rituals. She is now 24 years old and acts and talks like a very young child. She's a bright and well-adjusted person when it comes to academics, but she suffers from horribly impulsive and violent behavior from time to time. She isn't currently in a relationship, and is doing well at her job. She has a very negative relationship with her mother (the one who co-parented her), and is angry and anxious at the world around her. I want to help my daughter find stability in her life, but I'm not sure how I should proceed. I am also not clear whether the current way she is behaving is a normal part of OCD, or if it is some kind of side effect from the medications for her disorder. A: I would say it is hard to have peace and happiness in life without trust and love to share with others. Not many people can be a good friend and also a good mom or dad without being trustworthy or loving. While there are millions of people in the world who don't see or feel any love from other people they won't have troubles and problems at least for some part of their life. What you can do and try to do, is to search for someone to trust and to love and also do your best to love and to trust her at this day and age. You may find that your daughter needs to seek professional help, if you can afford it that is. You could try to approach with her your mother and see how she feels about her and then yourself about it. This is the first step to having peace and happiness in life. Sometimes our mother means most of all for us and also our mother is the one who has been there with us when we were babies and we won't ever forget and miss her since that day. So try to have a good and loving relationship with your daughter again and think about how she feels about the trust and love she needs and seems to miss. This will surely help and give you peace and happiness in life.
