to introduce a Bill to expand the powers of the Commission of Audit, which is the first stage in the Royal Commission of Audit.

And former Solicitor-General Harry Jenkins says that he can see no reason why the Audit Commission should not have the powers to do what the Auditor-General does. "If the Audit Commission is to hold companies to account for the public money they've received, it's reasonable that it should have the same powers," he said. "Any suggestion that that would be contentious, I don't think, in my view it wouldn't be." But the Commission of Audit has not been under that scrutiny for a very long time. "I don't think it's appropriate for the Audit Commission to be doing that," he said. "It needs to be focused on managing the Department of Finance. "I think that's quite different from the Auditor-General." Former government minister Stephen Conroy said today that the changes are needed. "There are issues that need to be examined with regard to the Auditor-General's Act, and the Commission of Audit Act," he said. "Some of those are very technical and some are more fundamental, so it's a question of reconciling those. "There are some power imbalances, as there are with the Auditor-General, between the different arms of the government. "There's no point in having a well-run, effective government unless you have a good system of independent scrutiny." But he is against expanding the powers of the Audit Commission. " 54b84cb42d
