Additional information can be found on – A Skyfall-Inspired Range For The Holiday Season As if the world didn't have enough things to worry about this year (storms, food shortages, disease and more – but that's another story), supermarket chains everywhere are preparing for the latest addition to the annual list of apocalyptic trends – Black Friday. The Black Friday phenomenon originated in the United States, where the frantic pre-Christmas shopping marathon led to skyrocketing crowds in high-traffic areas such as department stores and shopping malls. In Britain, the concept has taken hold in the form of heavy discounts on upmarket electricals and consumer electronics with supermarkets running early deals on the likes of TVs, games consoles and so on in a bid to take their place as unofficial 'mid-week Christmas.' It's all a part of the service industry, of course, and supermarkets in Britain are no exception to the trend. There are those who, when approached with the prospect of a late or otherwise out-of-hour shopping expedition, reject the idea out of hand. It's all a bit too 'Amish', they say. Yet, for all the moaning and groaning about how long it takes to check out at the till, it seems
