angiotensin II-induced mediator of the hepatic response to burn injury in rat. Substance P, a newly characterized tachykinin peptide, has been demonstrated to be a possible mediator of various hepatic responses to injury, including liver regeneration. To determine whether substance P participates in the hepatic response to burn injury and whether its hepatic actions are mediated via activation of the AT1 subtype of the angiotensin II receptor, we examined the effect of burn injury on hepatic protein and mRNA production of substance P, its precursor prokineticin, and the substance P receptor, as well as on the subsequent hepatic expression of factors that characterize the hepatic response to injury, including the alpha-fetoprotein gene and heme oxygenase-1. Burn injury resulted in marked elevations in both hepatic substance P mRNA and hepatic protein levels, with corresponding increases in hepatic immunoreactive substance P and immunoreactive prokineticin. Burn injury also induced hepatic expression of factors characteristic of the hepatic injury response, including hepatocyte growth factor and alpha-fetoprotein. The hepatic response to burn injury was significantly blunted by administration of the selective AT1 receptor antagonist, candesartan, by pret
