More particularly, the invention relates to such devices having a reduction or set of devices for selective sequential operation wherein the set of devices can be connected in parallel with a set of series connected devices to convert the parallel devices to a serial device. The continued increase in electrical power demand coupled with the decrease in the size of the individual power devices has resulted in a device whose inductance is relatively large and whose resistance is fairly high. Because the number of such devices is so large and because the current drawn per device is so high, the devices have a tendency to radiate a significant amount of energy in the form of electromagnetic waves. One way to reduce this tendency is to provide a set of semiconductor devices that can be switched to operate in a set of parallel configurations. As a general example, there may be a set of low resistance and high inductance, controllable power semiconductor devices each connected in parallel with a set of controllable, but much lower resistance, power devices that are connected in series with the controllable power devices. In this way, the voltage across the controllable power devices and the current through the controllable power devices can be kept relatively low, thereby substantially reducing the amount of energy that is radiated by the controllable power devices. It should be noted that this approach is not exclusive to MOS devices, as such devices can also be used. The problems associated with making this type of conversion are a concern particularly with regard to the power devices that are connected in series with the power devices that are connected in parallel.
