in obstetric anesthesia for the first time, and their education in a variety of areas, and their opinion of the importance of obstetric anesthesia, contributed to the current changes in the delivery setting and to the change in the role of the obstetric anesthesiologist. These changes include a large number of nonemergent cesarean deliveries, an increase in use of regional analgesia, and the decreasing trend in use of general anesthesia. Current developments in the area include the trend toward planned cesarean deliveries and the introduction of a new role for the obstetric anesthesiologist in the management of intrapartum and neonatal morbidity. assumed that, in a rapidly shifting environment, a signal eliciting a motor response would have less chance of being transmitted to the brain. To test this assumption, a new study by Sveiby and colleagues tested the ability of paramecia to swim away from a turning light stimulus in a tank of paramecia that had been mixed with a group of fish that had been taught to respond to a “turn” light signal. The results: The fish responded to the light stimulus. The individual fish may have been less likely to respond if the light had been caused by the movement of a paramecium, but the paramecia responded to the light stimulus no matter what. Moreover, individual paramecia lost mobility when a light was shone on them. Also, the
