The vasodilator effects of caffeine were tested in isolated perfused rat vasa recta (VR). The vessels were isolated by microdissection and cannulated for perfusion. Under voltage-clamp conditions, VR relaxed in response to the agonists acetylcholine (ACh) and adenosine-5'-triphosphate (ATP). In this study, the concentration-response relationship was determined for caffeine in VR and also in the ACh and ATP responses. Caffeine was a noncompetitive antagonist of the ACh response and had little effect on the ATP response. The K(i) values were not significantly different for the ACh and ATP responses, whereas the maximal relaxations were greater with ACh than with ATP. The maximal ACh relaxation was reduced to 42% of the control by 80 microM caffeine and to 37% of the control by 320 microM caffeine. The maximal ATP relaxation was also reduced to 58% of the control by 80 microM caffeine and to 31% of the control by 320 microM caffeine. The data suggest that caffeine inhibits the ACh response by acting as a partial antagonist of the cholinergic receptor at a site distal to the receptor-channel complex.
