I have an idea for a light-weight and small utility for Window Management that I want to make public, as well as fix some bugs. Below is a screenshot and description. I have three menus - "File" "Edit" and "Help" on the left side, and on the top, there is a toggle that allows to switch between open or minimized application windows, windows with 1, 2 or 3 rows and only one application on a row. This allows me to focus on one or two tasks at once, without closing other applications, or minimizing them to the system tray. And with a single mouse click, all open windows will be placed on the task bar. This is the program. Feel free to give me some constructive comments. Please download the program from the link below, and test it out! I'm releasing my first tool: Splitview. Splitview is a tool for splitting your desktop into one window for your editor and other for your shell. It's a wrapper around xsplit or xvview, which give you a useful feature, to have multiple workspaces in one window. An icon for this tool, with some screenshots, will be included in the next release of Fences 4. You may know the Metro Sidebar of Windows 8 is unique from the legacy sidebar of Windows 7. It's comfortable and lets users customize their sidebar however they like, but it's also one of the most frustrating and non-intuitive elements of the new operating system. Microsoft should have called it Metro IE, because it's like an out-of-control child throwing a temper tantrum when the parent orders him to stop playing. What is it? If you're not familiar with the Metro IE sidebar, it's like any other sidebar you've seen before. Like Windows Explorer, it's a separate window that sits above your main browser window. It's also very similar to the sidebar in Internet Explorer 9, which also you can turn off or hide using Windows' "View settings" dialog. Let's look at it. Is it any different? Sure. Like the new Windows 8 sidebar, the sidebar in IE11 contains tiles. It also has a handy list of frequently visited sites at the top. But what's frustrating is that it's completely unrelated to your regular browsing activities. While you're browsing the web, the Metro IE sidebar will be populated with tiles from the new Microsoft Edge browser and other Metro-themed apps. If you click a tile in the Metro IE sidebar, you'll be taken to the "correct" URL in your Internet Explorer session, even if the same URL is on a completely different webpage. So, for example, if you have Chrome open, and it's on a webpage that includes a link to
