A summer that saw massive floods in South and the Midwest, brutal wildfires and mudslides in California, and massive storms churning across the eastern seaboard as a result of what forecasters call a "500-year" weather event, reached its peak on Friday with a summer rainstorm with as much as 4-6 inches of rain in parts of the Ohio Valley. "It's going to be a rain-soaked September," said Jim Burgess, a meteorologist with the National Weather Service's Weather Prediction Center in College Park, Maryland, in an interview with Reuters. September is typically the wettest month in the United States, but the mid-September deluge is unusual. Forecasters expect much of the southern part of the eastern U.S. to receive close to or more than half of the seasonal rainfall total by month's end. The once-proud drought of 2012, which received so much attention because of how widespread it was, is largely forgotten, while the U.S. drought of 2012-13, which received little attention, continues into its second year. Records show that the U.S. has been in a drought for the last 36 years, with the worst drought recorded in the country hitting from 1976 to 1988. The calendar for the upcoming months is a mixed bag, with drought conditions persisting in the arid western states, while the Midwest is not as dry, helping drive record-setting water levels at water stations in the
