In this case it's definitely not the result of user input. An easy way to fix your problem is to change your code to this: protected override void OnStartup(StartupEventArgs e) { base.OnStartup(e); String result = this.Text; if (result == null) { MessageBox.Show("Login Failed", "Error", MessageBoxButton.OK, MessageBoxImage.Error); return; } } If you want to retrieve a value from a TextBox, you should use this instead: protected override void OnStartup(StartupEventArgs e) { base.OnStartup(e); String result = (string)this.TextBox.Text; if (result == null) { MessageBox.Show("Login Failed",

So I figured I better share with you what I know to be a good neighborhood and not one of these kid-unfriendly places. Here goes: Upper Haight The Upper Haight is to the Northwest of Downtown, close to Union Square and the two blocks just over the bridge to Chinatown. Frothy Treats, from @mehkadir. Her ice cream pops are delicious and addictive. We bought an ice cream sampler when we visited. The restaurant has a few cafes on the street that are open for lunch and a couple of yoga studios and coffee shops are also on the street. The Haight is a far quieter and more laid back than some of the other neighborhoods in the city and so has fewer tourists. The neighborhood has a few bars and an art gallery, as well as a few small restaurants and cafes and a great book store. Haight-Ashbury The Haight is a bit further to the Northwest of Downtown and the Lower Haight. Haight-Ashbury Haight-Ashbury is probably the most famous and loved neighborhood in San Francisco. Haight Street is an old beatnik, bohemian, hippie, and punk street. It is lined with cafes, shops, and restaurants. The Haight is divided into the Upper Haight to the Northwest and the Lower Haight to the Southeast. It is also the home to the hippest bars in the city, the most famous street in San Francisco, the Victorian-era Haight-Ashbury district, and one of the best parties in the city, the legendary Dead Kennedys show in August. Acre Manor The so-called "Acre Manor" is the area surrounding the historic landmark (a former country house) called the "Acre Manor." The area has a funky bohemian feel to it with the laid back cafes and restaurants. There are some new boutique hotels popping up here too. So there you go, my favorite neighborhoods in San Francisco. If you want to venture away from the busy tourist areas, these neighborhoods are worth a visit. There's more to San Francisco than Castro Street. And San Francisco definitely isn't all about San Francisco's famous Castro Street. In fact, it may surprise you to find out how much there is to see and do in San Francisco if you just take a trip to this city. It's like no other city - and that's a good thing!
