Gastrointestinal (GI) diseases continue to pose major health and economic burdens, and the approach for diagnosis and management has been an ongoing challenge. We performed a next-generation sequencing (NGS)-based disease-gene discovery study to identify gene mutations that cause and/or are associated with chronic diarrhoea and gut inflammation. The study included three children and one adult with chronic diarrhoea that had been resistant to standard therapy. The three children had autoimmune enteropathy, in which inflammatory and structural abnormalities were observed in the intestine. The adult had chronic watery diarrhoea with malabsorption. In this patient, a peroxisome proliferator-activated receptor-gamma gene mutation was detected. Gene mutations were identified in four of the nine patients; these included three previously known diarrhoea-causing gene mutations (DNAJB6, TMEM195 and PNPT1) and one novel gene mutation, the gene encoding an alpha-subunit of the Src homology 2-containing proteins, SHC1 (encoded by SHC1). In two patients, chronic diarrhoea associated with small intestinal bacterial overgrowth and subsequent
