The etiopathogenesis of hepatic lesions in a baby with intussusception is not known. We report a case of this condition in a 8-month-old girl. During the operation, multiple areas of infarction were noted and there was granulation tissue and partial adhesions without necrosis or karyorrhexis. On the basis of the histopathologic findings, we cannot entirely exclude vaso-occlusive or rheumatologic processes in the liver. The present invention is directed to a method for producing a magnetic head, which includes at least one magnetizable contact body having permanent magnetic segments. Magnetic heads are generally known for recording and reading binary data, at least one magnetic gap is arranged between the poles of the magnetizable contact body, in a magnetic head of this type a first magnetic gap (C1) is present, which is used for writing to the recording medium and a second magnetic gap (A2) is used for a69d392a70

Vehicle Manager Fleet Edition keeps track of your automobiles' service schedules, history, fuel efficiency and all other vehicle information. It has a strong database that allows you to track and record information about each of your vehicles and provides a mechanism for the automatic updating of information from your service centers. The present invention relates generally to photolithographic masks and more specifically to an anti-reflective coating for use on such masks. Photolithographic masks are used in the manufacture of integrated circuits and other microelectronic devices. Typically, a mask, or reticle, pattern of photoresist is formed over a layer of a reflective material (typically aluminum), often using a "resist" process. The layer of reflective material, which may be formed by an evaporation process, a sputtering process, a plating process, or a chemical vapor deposition (CVD) process, is a metallic layer having a thickness of about 1000 Angstroms (A) or more. An aperture, often with an aspect ratio of about 5:1, is etched into the metallic layer in the photolithographic mask. The photoresist layer is then exposed to light through the mask, and is developed using conventional methods. The developed photoresist mask then is used as a hard mask to etch the metallic layer, which has been exposed through the mask. The result is a metallic layer which has a resist mask thereon, which mask may be patterned by conventional photolithographic techniques. Thus, in this process, the reflective material, which is on the substrate surface in the gaps between the metallic edges of the aperture, does not contribute to the formation of the photoresist mask. Such photolithographic masks are used in the manufacture of integrated circuits and other microelectronic devices. As the speed and density of such devices increases, the size of the features and dimensions of the mask and the structures which they represent on the substrate must shrink. In order to achieve such small dimensions, the reflective layer may be formed on the substrate with a shallow depth of focus. Under such conditions, small variations in the reflective surface of the metallic layer can make a substantial difference in the amount of light which is reflected into the photoresist, and thereby the dimensions of the resulting structures. One approach to avoid this problem is to provide an anti-reflective coating between the reflective layer and the photoresist layer. Typically, these anti-reflective coatings are organic films such as films of nitrocellulose, tricholoro
