There are many ways to reduce post-processing (baking) time including: Trimming down the image size Increasing the number of layers Reducing the image resolution (pixel size) Decreasing the number of colors Converting to a smart object (or clipping mask) There are some other ways, but I recommend using the two methods I listed above. Resizing and Reducing the File Size Trimming is the simplest way to reduce image size. In simple terms, trimming removes all the unwanted and unnecessary parts of the image. This gives the image a nice and clean look. Unfortunately, most images have some unwanted parts and we do not want to lose these parts when we are trimming down the size of the image. Alternatively, you can reduce the size of an image by creating a new image with less quality at a lower resolution. You can reduce the size of an image by using the crop tool. The crop tool is the last effect in the toolbox. Most people think crop is an effect but it is not. Crop is actually a tool and you can use it as an effect. The crop tool is very useful, in fact, it's indispensable. Basically, the crop tool allows you to remove the unwanted part of the image and keep the best part of the image, also known as cropping. Before using the crop tool, select the crop tool. You can do that by clicking the icon of the crop tool in the layers palette. You can then add a new layer, select the crop tool, or press the N key to add the crop tool as a shortcut. On the top panel of the crop tool window, you will see different options. Crop Image Keep All Layers Stretch the canvas to fit image Use Selection In the Crop Image section, you can crop the image in four different ways: Free crop: Select the Crop tool and then add the free crop shape. The free crop window will appear as a small window. You will see the desired cropping for the image. In the image shown below, the free crop shape is a green rectangle. In addition to this, you will also see options for the sides of the image. Click on the appropriate side to crop the image accordingly. Click the red rectangle a681f4349e

Sarah Tew/CNET If you've ever been on a city train and had the phone in your pocket buzz while riding, you may want to take a close look at your mobile data plan. That buzz can mean a call from a telemarketer and an unknown number. The phone number could even be a real number, one that's known to the person in your pocket. But in either case, chances are it wasn't you calling them. New data from mobile analytics firm One Touch ID show that the world's most popular mobile phone users, known as Samsung Galaxy S6 users, got calls and texts from unknown numbers more often in 2017 than in any of the previous years. Those unknown numbers ended up on their phone bill, contributing to their overall mobile data use. According to One Touch data, more than half of all users got at least one unknown number call, though some got many more. The mysterious phone calls and texts are a phone security feature that comes turned on by default. It is designed to prevent calls and texts from unknown numbers from ringing. If someone's phone is not set up to answer calls from unknown numbers, the phone will go into a screen that says "Unknown number" or "Call failed." For users, that's usually a problem. They don't have to know the phone number of the person who is texting or calling them. But for the company the phone calls and texts are supposed to originate from, they can end up costing a lot of money. Costs from unknown phone calls and texts For many of these unknown callers, they are likely trying to connect with a business or organization. It could be a business you know, like the store you just happened to be in that week. Or maybe it's a company you've never heard of before. You see, when someone texts or calls a person or company, the person answering the phone can look up the company in a database, figure out who is being called or texted from the number and find out more information about them. Think of it as a marketing ploy: more people are looking at your business, and they're making the call or text to get information about what you do, where you're located, when you're open and what you offer. All things businesses are looking for in ads, whether they're physical ads or digital ones. The World Health Organization found that half of all new international calls come from mobile phones, and that 70
