Organize your music collection with Melomania, the ultimate organizer for music lovers. [1], it seems that researchers are discovering more and more hereditary syndromes linked to anorexia nervosa and bulimia nervosa. Future research into endocrine features in these disorders might shed light on the etiology of these disorders. Currently, it is not known whether the genetic association is related to anorexia nervosa or to the eating disorders phenotype. Therefore, it might be possible that this genetic association is due to one or more genetic factors predisposing to both the eating disorders and to the endocrine disorders. Since endocrinological disorders are common among eating disorder patients [2], it is not surprising that genetic associations between the eating disorders and endocrinological phenotypes have also been found. Specifically, a genetic association between anorexia nervosa and low BMI and between anorexia nervosa and menstrual dysfunction has been reported [3, 4, 5]. Interestingly, some studies have also found genetic associations between anorexia nervosa and hyperthyroidism [6], although there are also other studies that did not find a link between the two disorders [7]. The etiology of anorexia nervosa and hyperthyroidism is thought to be different, since the genetic contribution to the anorexia nervosa seems to be largely additive to the genetic contribution to hyperthyroidism [8]. The association between anorexia nervosa and hyperthyroidism may be explained by the fact that eating disorders are highly heritable [9, 10], and it has been suggested that the familial tendency to anorexia nervosa results in a familial tendency to hyperthyroidism [11]. Since most of the reported genetic associations between the eating disorders and endocrine disorders have been negative, it is possible that the underlying phenotypes in these studies were not the same as the phenotypes found in patients with actual eating disorders. Even though it might be difficult to find a phenotype that resembles eating disorders and endocrine disorders, it is known that there is a close relationship between certain genetic traits and endocrine disorders and vice versa [12]. Therefore, it might be possible to find a more closely related phenotype in the future. Another limitation might be the
