But the I-15 is often clogged as well, and because the primary flows go directly to the Anaheim Valley, it can take a few days for water to make it there. More here: I wouldn't go to the trouble of building a water-storage pond, but I would definitely plan on having a truck dry-storage facility in the backyard for things like flat tires, broken water-pumps, and odd-sized items that you don't want to leave in the car all night because your tire is too small or whatever. Originally Posted by ApexDuo I've heard 1/3 the vale is inaccessible from water except through a fairly steep canyon, I think. Last I checked there was a road that went there for those interested. It's not a serious issue. To the former Arco employees, I feel very sorry for you. I hope someone has told you about the laws against "fracking" in the state. It is a crime, and the potential is huge. I have had friends that work for Arco and Arco does not wish to promote it, because they are not allowed to. Regardless, Arco pulled the plug on the project, and they took their engineering crew with them. Ha! I know. I was one of the testers of it for Arco. "Fracking" - that's like "Tovah," it is not allowed in the state of California. Especially with the rumors about earthquakes. The project was $7.5 billion dollars, and it was funded by all the big oil companies that are in California, including the Royalty companies. The Royalty companies pushed for the R&D to be done in California, because California's regulations were much tougher than Texas's. 1. the biggest cause of tanking in the valley is the rev ball. I know because i have been there, and we lost over 50 tanks, more in my memory than i can count. its a huge issue. 2. i have also been on the Canyons, and am considering building a tour vehicle, as it will be hard to get to when out there. 3. i have also been on Canyon Lake, for paintball only.
